background history

United Electric Tramways of Montevideo Ltd was set up in the early twentieth century by La Sociedad Commercial de Montevideo, the local affiliate of a British transport company which, alongside La Transatlántica (affiliated to a rival German transport company), had purchased controlling interests in Montevideo's seven existing horse-drawn streetcar lines in anticipation of the electrification and expansion of the tramway system.

The first electrified line, owned by La Sociedad Commercial, opened in late 1906 and ran from the business district of the city to the beach suburb of Pocitos. Other lines were opened over the course of the next five years by both La Sociedad Commercial and La Transatlántica, and passenger numbers multiplied. The tramway companies were subject to a high degree of state regulation, concerning for example the expansion of their networks and fare prices. The companies were eventually nationalised in the 1940s, and the tramway system itself was dismantled during the following decade.

The London bank Glyn, Mills & Co appears to have been involved in financing United Electric Tramways of Montevideo Ltd.
